There it is said that the sons of Kṛitavīrya, wishing to destroy the descendants of Bhṛigu in order to recover the wealth left them by their father, slew even the children in the womb. One of the women of the family of Bhṛigu, in order to preserve her embryo, secreted it in her thigh (ūru), whence the child at its birth was named Aurva; on beholding whom, the sons of Kṛitavīrya were struck with blindness, and from whose wrath proceeded a flame that threatened to destroy the world, had not Aurva at the persuasion of the Bhārgavas cast it into the ocean, where it remained concealed, and having the face of a horse. क

क 1. ka, the first consonant of the alphabet, and the first of the guttural letters, corresponding in sound to k in keep or king. — Ka-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound ka. — Kakāra-varga, as, m. the guttural consonants collectively.

क 2. ka, kas, kā, kim, interrog. pron. (see kim and 2. kad, and cf. the following words in which the interrogative base ka appears, katama, katara, kati, katham, kadā, karhi, kā, &c.), who? which? what? In its declension ka follows the pronoun tad (Gram. 223) except in nom. acc. sing. neut., where kim has taken the place of kad or kat in classical Sanskṛit; but the old form kad is found in the Veda.

The interrogative sentence introduced by ka is often terminated by iti (e. g. kasya sa putra iti kathyatām, let it be said, 'whose son is he?'), but iti may be omitted and the sentence lose its direct interrogative character (e. g. kasya sa putro na jñāyate, it is not known whose son he is). Ka with or without as, 'to be,' may express 'how is it possible that?' 'what power have I, you, they, &c.?' (e. g. ke mama dhanvino 'nye, what can the other archers do against me? ke āvām paritrātum, what power have we to rescue you?). Ka is often connected with a demonstrative pron. (e. g. ko 'yam āyāti, who comes here?) or with the potential (e. g. ko Harim nindet, who will blame Hari?). Ka is sometimes repeated (e. g. kaḥ ko 'tra, who is there? kān kān, whom? whom? i. e. which of them? cf. Gram. 53. a), and the repetition is often due to a kind of attraction (e. g. keshām kim śāstram adhyayanīyam, which book is to be read by whom? Gram. 836. a). When kim is connected with the inst. c. of a noun or with the indecl. participle it may express 'what is gained by doing so, &c.?' (e. g. nīrujaḥ kim aushadhaiḥ, what is the use of medicine to the healthy? kim vilambena, what is gained by delay? kim bahunā, what is the use of more words? kim pauruṣham hatvā suptam, what manliness is there in killing one asleep?).

Ka is often followed by the particles iva, u, nāma, nu, vā, svid, some of which serve merely to generalize the interrogation (e. g. kim iva etad, what can this be? ka u śravat, who can possibly hear? ko nāma jānāti, who indeed knows? ko no ayam, who is this? kim nu kāryam, what is to be done? ko vā devād anyaḥ, who possibly other than a god? kasya svid hṛidayaṃ nāsti, of what person is there no heart?).

Ka is occasionally used alone as an indefinite pronoun, especially in negative sentences (e. g. na kasya ko vallabhaḥ, no one is a favourite of any one; nānyo jānāti kaḥ, no one else knows; kathaṃ sa ghātayati kam, how does he kill any one? More usually, however, ka is only made indefinite when connected with the particles ća, ćana, ćid, vā, and api, in which case ka may sometimes be preceded by the relative ya (e. g. ye ke ća, any persons whatsoever; yasyai kasyai ća devatāyai, to any deity whatsoever; yāni kāni ća mitrāṇi, any friends whatsoever; yat kiṅćana, whatever). The particle ćana, being composed of ća and na, properly gives a negative force to the pronoun (e. g. yasmād Indrād ṛite kiṅćana, without which Indra there is nothing), but the negative sense is generally dropped (e. g. kaśćana, any one; na kaśćana, no one), and a relative is sometimes connected with it (e. g. yat kiṅćana, anything whatsoever). Examples of ćid with the interrogative are common; vā and api are not so common, but the latter is often found in classical Sanskṛit (e. g. kaścid, any one; kećid, some; na kaścid, no one; na kiṅćid api, nothing whatsoever; yaḥ kaścid, any one whatsoever; kećit—kećit, some—others; yasmin kasmin vā deśe, in any country whatsoever; na ko 'pi, no one; na kimapi, nothing whatever).

Ka may sometimes be used, like 2. kad, at the beginning of a compound. See ka-pūya, &c.

क 3. ka, as, m. the Who? the Inexplicable, the Unknown. By a forced and erroneous interpretation of the interrogative pronoun occurring in a hymn of the Ṛig-veda (X. 121. kasmai devāya havishā vidhema, what god shall we worship with oblations?) the word ka is applied as a name to any chief god or object of worship, as Prajāpati, Brahmā, Vishṇu; air or wind; the sun; the mind; the soul; Yama; Kāma-deva, the god of love; fire; a peacock; a N. of Daksha (a clever or dexterous man?); a knot, joint; the king of the birds; a prince in general; the body; time; wealth, property; sound; light, splendor.

क 4. ka, am, n. (also regarded as ind.), happiness, joy, pleasure; water; the head, hair; a head of hair. (Perhaps this word has arisen from a far-fetched etymology of the word nāka, 'pleasure,' i. e. na-ā-ka, 'not-not-pleasure.') — Ka-ja, as, ā, am, produced in or by water, watery, aquatic; (am), n. a lotus. — Ka-da, as, m. 'giving water,' a cloud. Kam, ind. See 1. kam, s. v.

(e. g. katamena pathā yātās te, by which road have they gone?). Katama is often a mere strengthened substitute for ka, the superlative affix imparting emphasis. Hence it may occasionally be used for 'who or which of two?' (e. g. tayoḥ katamasmai, to which of these two?). It may optionally be compounded with the word to which it refers (e. g. katamaḥ Kaṭhaḥ or katama-kaṭhaḥ, which Kaṭha out of many?). In negative sentences katama with cana or katama with api = not even one, none at all (e. g. na katamac-canāhaḥ, not even on a single day, on no day at all). In the sense of 'several,' 'some,' kati is generally followed by cit or api (e. g. katicid ahāni, for several or some days). Kati may be used as an adverb with cid in the sense of 'oftentimes,' 'much,' 'in many ways' (e. g. katicit stutaḥ, much or often praised). Kati-kṛitvas, ind. how many times? kati-vidha, as, ā, am, of how many kinds? kati-śas, how many at a time?

Sometimes katham merely introduces an interrogation (e. g. katham ātmānaṃ nivedayāmi katham vā ātmāpahāraṃ karomi, shall I declare myself or shall I withdraw?).

Katham is often found in connection with the particles iva, nāma, nu, svid, which appear to generalize the interrogation (how possibly? &c.); with nu it sometimes = kinu or kutas (e. g. katham nu, how much more! na katham nu, how much less!).

Katham is often connected, like kim, with the particles ćana, ćid, and api, which give an indefinite sense to the interrogative (e. g. katham ćana, in no way, not at all). When not itself negative katham ćana = in some way, some how; scarcely, with difficulty; na katham ćana, in no way; kathaṅćit, some how or other, by some means or other, in any way, with some difficulty, scarcely, in a moderate degree, a little; na kathaṅćit, not at all, in no way whatever; na kathaṅćid na, in no way not, i. e. most decidedly; yathā kathaṅćit, in any way whatsoever; kathaṅćid yadi jīvati, it is with difficulty that he lives; katham api, some how or other, with some difficulty, scarcely, a little; katham api nu, by no means, not at all. In addition to the above senses lexicographers assert that katham may imply 'amazement, surprise, pleasure, abuse;' [with katham cf. Gr. κατά.]

At the beginning of an adjective compound katham may have the same sense as kim. — Katham-rūpa, as, ā, am, of what shape? — Katham-vīrya, as, ā, am, of what power? — Katham-kathika, as, ā, am (fr. katham katham), one who is always asking questions, an inquisitive person. — Katham-kathika-tā, f. questioning, inquiring, inquisitiveness. — Kathaṃkathita (?), as, m. an interrogant, one who puts questions. — Katham-karman, ā, ā, a, how acting? — Katham-kāram, ind. in which manner? — Katham-tā, f. enquiry, question, demand. — Katham-pramāṇa, as, ā, am, of what measure? — Katham-bhāva, as, m. what state? — Katham-bhūta, as, ā, am, how being? of what kind?

Rarely kam seems to be used, like kad and kim, as an interrogative particle; sometimes it occurs, like kim and kad, at the beginning of compounds, marking the strange or unusual character of anything, [cf. kandarpa]: according to native lexicographers kam means also head; water; food. — Kam-vat, ān, atī, at, Ved. lovely.

Kim is much used as a particle of interrogation like the Lat. num, an, sometimes translateable by 'whether?' but oftener serving only like a note of interrogation to mark a question (e. g. kiṃ vyādhā vane 'smin sañćaranti, do hunters roam about in this wood? In an interrogation the verb if uncompounded with a preposition generally retains its accent after kim). To this sense may be referred the kim expressing blame, deficiency, &c., at the beginning of compounds (e. g. kiṃ-rājan, what sort of a king? i. e. a bad king); also the kim prefixed to verbs with a similar meaning (e. g. kim-adhīte, he reads badly). Kim—uta or kim—utavā or kim—uta—uta or kim—athavā—uta, whether—or—or; [cf. uta.]

Kim is very frequently connected with other particles, as follows: kim aṅga, wherefore then? atha kim, how else? surely; kim api, somewhat, to a considerable extent, rather, much more, still further; kim iti, why? (see iti); kimu or kimuta, how much more? how much less? kiṃ kila, what a pity! (expressing dissatisfaction); kiñća, moreover, further; kiñ-ćana (originally negative = 'in no way'), to a certain degree, a little; kiñćit, somewhat, a little; kiṃ tarhi, how then? but, however; kintu, but, however, nevertheless (bearing the same relation to tu that kiñća bears to ća); kin-nu, whether indeed? (a stronger interrogative than kim alone); how much more? how much less? kin nu khalu, how possibly? (a still stronger interrogative); kim punar, how much more? how much less? kiṃ vā, whether? or whether? or, (often a mere particle of interrogation); kiṃ svit, whether? how? (a mere particle of interrogation like the last).

(In the earlier legends he appears as a great hero and teacher; in the more recent he is deified, and is often represented as a young and amorous shepherd with flowing hair and a flute in his hand. The following are a few particulars of his birth and history as related in the Purāṇas &c.: Vasu-deva, who was a descendant of Yadu and Yayāti, had two wives, Rohiṇī and Devakī. The latter had eight sons, of whom the eighth was Kṛishṇa. Kaṃsa, king of Mathurā and cousin of Devakī, was informed by a prediction that one of these sons would kill him. He therefore kept Vasu-deva and his wife in confinement, and slew their first six children. The seventh was Bala-rāma, who was saved by being abstracted from the womb of Devakī and transferred to that of Rohiṇī. The eighth was Kṛishṇa, who was born with black skin and a peculiar mark on his breast. His father Vasu-deva managed to escape from Mathurā with the child, and favoured by the gods found a herdsman named Nanda, whose wife Yaśodā had just been delivered of a son, which Vasu-deva conveyed to Devakī, after substituting his own in its place. Nanda with his wife Yaśodā took the infant Kṛishṇa and settled first in Gokula or Vraja, and afterwards in Vṛindāvana, where Kṛishṇa and Bala-rāma grew up together, roaming in the woods and joining in the sports of the herdsmen's sons. Kṛishṇa as a youth contested the sovereignty of Indra, and was victorious over that god, who descended from heaven to praise Kṛishṇa, and made him lord over the cattle. Kṛishṇa is described as sporting constantly with the Gopīs or shepherdesses, of whom a thousand became his wives, though only eight are specified, Rādhā being the favourite. Kṛishṇa built and fortified a city called Dvāraka in Gujarāt, and thither transported the inhabitants of Mathurā after killing Kaṃsa. Kṛishṇa had various wives besides the Gopīs, and by Rukmiṇī had a son Pradyumna, who is usually identified with Kāma-deva; with Jainas, Kṛishṇa is one of the nine black Vasu-devas; with Buddhists he is the chief of the black demons, who are the enemies of Buddha and the white demons); N. of a king of the Nāgas; N. of an Asura or demon; N. of Arjuna, the most renowned of the Pāṇḍu princes (so named apparently from his colour as a child, see Mahā-bh. गन्धर्व gandharva or sometimes in post-Vedic writings gandharba, as, m. a Gandharva. Though in later times the Gandharvas are regarded as a class, yet in the Ṛig-veda rarely more than one is mentioned; he is commonly designated as the 'heavenly Gandharva' (dirya Gandharvaḥ), and sometimes named Viśvā-vasu; his habitation is the sky, or the region of the air and the heavenly waters; his especial duty is to guard the heavenly Soma, which the gods obtain through his intervention. It is obtained for the human race by Indra, who conquers the Gandharva and takes it by force. The heavenly Gandharva is supposed to be a good physician, because the Soma is considered as the best medicine; possibly, however, the word Soma originally denoted not the beverage so called, but the moon, and the heavenly Gandharva may have been the genius or tutelary deity of the moon. It is certain that the heavenly Gandharva and the Soma are sometimes identified. He is also regarded as one of the genii who regulate the course of the Sun's horses; he knows and makes known the secrets of heaven and divine truths generally. He is the parent of the first pair of human beings, Yama and Yamī, and has a peculiar mystical power over women and a right to possess them. For this reason he is invoked in marriage ceremonies. Exstatic states of mind and possession by evil spirits are supposed to be derived from the heavenly Gandharva. With Jainas he is an attendant of the seventeenth Arhat of the present Avasarpiṇī. The Gandharvas as a class have the same characteristic features as the one Gandharva; they live in the sky, guard the Soma, are governed by Varuṇa (just as the Apsarasas are governed by Soma), know the best medicines, regulate the course of the asterisms (in one passage of the Vājasaneyi-Saṃhitā twenty-seven being mentioned), follow after women and are desirous of intercourse with them. As soon as a girl becomes marriageable, she belongs to Soma, the Gandharvas and Agni. The wives of the Gandharvas are the Apsarasas, and like them the Gandharvas are invoked in gambling with dice; they are also feared as evil beings together with the Rakshasas, Kimīdins, Piśāćas, &c., amulets being worn as a protection against them. In the Śatapatha-Brāhmaṇa they are called the preceptors of the Rishis. In epic poetry the Gandharvas are the celestial musicians or heavenly singers who form the orchestra at the banquets of the gods, and they belong together with the Apsarasas to Indra's heaven, sharing also in his battles. In the more systematic mythology the Gandharvas constitute one of the classes into which the higher creation is divided (e. g. gods, manes, Gandharvas; or gods, Asuras, Gandharvas, men, &c.). In one passage of the Taittirīya-Āraṇyaka eleven classes of Gandharvas are mentioned. The chief or leader of the Gandharvas is named Citra-ratha. They are sometimes called the creatures of Prajāpati or Brahmā. With Jainas the Gandharvas constitute one of the eight classes of the Vyantaras. The following meanings are also given to the word gandharva— a singer; the Koil or black cuckoo; the soul after death, and previous to its being born again (corresponding in some respects to the western notion of a ghost); a horse; the sun; a sage, a pious man; a kind of deer, according to some, the musk deer; (ī), f. ङ

ङ 1. ṅa, the fifth consonant of the Sanskṛit alphabet, and the nasal of the first class. No real word in use begins with this letter; it is usually found as the first member of a compound consonant preceded by a vowel; the sound of ṅ corresponds to that of ng in song. — Ṅa-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound ṅa.

ङ 2. ṅa, as, m. an object of sense; desire, wish for any sensual object; an epithet of Śiva; (Bhairava.)

च 1. ća, the twentieth letter of the alphabet, and first of the second or palatal class of consonants, having the simple sound of ch in church. — Ća-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound ća.

च 2. ća, ind. (a particle and conjunction usually translateable by) and, both, also, moreover, as well as. This conjunction, like the Lat. que and Gr. τε, is usually placed as an enclitic after the word which it connects with what precedes, and when used with the personal pronouns these must appear in their fuller accented forms (e. g. tavu ća mama ća, both of thee and of me, not te ća me ća). It connects whole sentences as well as parts of sentences, and seems to have been originally placed after both the words or clauses which it joins together, for in the Ṛig-veda the double ća occurs much more frequently than the single (e. g. ahaṃ ća tvaṃ ća, I and thou). The double ća may also be used somewhat redundantly in classical Sanskṛit (e. g. kva hariṇakānāṃ jīvitaṃ ćātilolaṃ kva ća vajrasārāḥ śarās te, where is both the frail existence of fawns and where are thy adamantine arrows?). In the later literature, however, the first ća is more usually omitted (e. g. ahaṃ tvaṃ ća), and when more than two things are enumerated only one ća is often found (e. g. tejasā yaśasā lakshmyā sthityā ća parayā, in glory, in fame, in beauty, and in high condition). Elsewhere, when more than two things are enumerated, ća is placed after some and omitted after others (e. g. ṛiṇa-dātā ća vaidyaśća śrotriyo nadī, both the payer of a debt and a physician [and] a Brāhman [and] a river). In the Veda and even in classical Sanskṛit, when the double ća would generally be used, the second may occasionally be omitted (e. g. Indraśća Somaḥ, both Indra [and] Soma; durbhedyaśća āśu-sandheyaḥ, both difficult to be divided [and] quickly to be united). Rarely ća may imply a reference to certain other words which are not expressed (e. g. kamaṇḍalau ća karakaḥ, the word karaka has the meaning 'pitcher' and other meanings).

Ća may be used for vā and is then translateable by 'either,' 'or' (e. g. iha ćāmutra vā, either here or hereafter; strī vā pumān vā yaććānyat sattvam, either a woman or a man or any other being); and when a negative particle is joined with ća the two may then be translated by 'neither,' 'nor.' Occasionally one ća or one na may be omitted (e. g. na ća paribhoktuṃ naiva śaknomi hātum, I am able neither to enjoy nor to abandon; na pūrvāhṇe na ća parāhṇe, neither in the forenoon nor in the afternoon).

Ća is often joined to the adverbs eva, api, tathā, tathaiva, &c., either with or without a negative particle (e. g. vairiṇaṃ nopaseveta sahāyaṃ ćaiva vairiṇaḥ, one ought not to serve either an enemy or the ally of an enemy). See eva, api, &c.

Ća sometimes = eva, even, indeed, certainly, just, &c. (e. g. su-ćintitaṃ ćaushadhaṃ na nāmamātreṇa karoty a-rogam, even a well-devised remedy does not cure a disease by its mere name; yāvanta eva te tāvāṃśća sa, as great as they [were] just so great was he).

Ća may occasionally be disjunctive and be translated by 'but,' 'on the contrary,' 'on the other hand,' 'yet,' 'nevertheless' (e. g. varaṃ ādyau na ćāntimaḥ, better the two first but not the last; śāntam idam āśrama-padaṃ sphurati ća bāhuḥ, this hermitage is tranquil yet my arm throbs).

Ća—ća may be used to express immediate connection between two acts or their simultaneous occurrence (e. g. mama ća muktaṃ tamasā mano manasijena dhanushi śaraśća niveśitaḥ, no sooner is my mind freed from darkness than a shaft is fixed on his bow by the heart-born god).

Ća rarely = ćet, if (e. g. jīvituṃ ćećchase, if thou wishest to live).

Ća may be used as an expletive (e. g. anyaiśća kratubhiśća, and with other sacrifices). The native dictionaries assign to ća the following significations or forces:—conjunction (anv-āćaya), collective combination (sam-āhāra), mutual connection (itaretara), and aggregation (sam-uććaya). For the meaning of ća after an interrogative see 2. ka, 2. kathā, &c.; [cf. Gr. τε; Lat. que, pe (in nempe, &c.); Goth. uh; Zend ća; Old Pers. ćâ.]

च 3. ća, as, ā, am, seedless; bad, vile, mischievous; (as), m. a thief; a tortoise; the moon; an epithet of Śiva.

चिद् cid, ind. [cf. 2. ca and id], an enclitic particle, requiring in the Veda a preceding simple verb to retain its accent. In the Pada-pāṭha cid is considered as an independent word (kaś cid &c. being always separated into two words). In later Sanskṛit it is generally a particle affixed to interrogative pronouns to render them indefinite. The use of cid in Vedic Sanskṛit is principally to lay stress or emphasis on a preceding word or to extend or limit the sense. Hence it is often translateable by 'even,' 'indeed,' 'also,' 'at least,' 'just,' 'merely,' &c. (e. g. devāś cid, the gods indeed; ekasya cid, of one merely); or when preceded by a negative particle by 'not even' (e. g. na devāś cid, not even the gods): but its force may often be expressed by merely laying an emphasis on the word by which it is preceded. Hence in Nirukta I. 4. it is said to be used pūjāyām, i. e. for enhancing the force of a word. It is also stated by Yāska to be a particle of comparison (upamārthe). The following Vedic uses of cid may be noted; yaś cid, yathā cid, = when indeed, as indeed; cid—cid or cid—ca or cid—u, = as well as—as; both—and.

Cid is often joined to interrogative pronouns and adverbs (see 2. ka, katama, katara, kad, kim, katham, kadā, kutas, kva, &c.) to render them indefinite; especially in classical Sanskṛit, where the only other word after which it is found is jātu, q.v.

चेद् ced (originally 2. ca + id), a compound particle, never found at the beginning of a sentence or verse. In the Veda it is sometimes used as a conjunction, like the simple ca, in the sense of 'and,' 'also,' 'even.' But in Vedic as well as classical Sanskṛit the most usual sense of ced is 'if,' 'although,' 'provided that,' 'when,' and in these senses it may be joined with the present indicative (e. g. mahyaṃ ced dadāti tat, if he gives that to me); or with the future (e. g. trishṇāṃ cet tyakshyati, if he shall abandon avarice); or with the conditional (e. g. vṛishṭiṃ ced abharishyat, if there should have been rain); or with the potential (e. g. gaccheć cet, if he should go); or with the perfect (e. g. sa cen mamāra, when he died); or with a participle (e. g. kartavyaṃ cet priyaṃ mahyam, if a kindness is to be done to me). It should be observed that in the Veda the verb which depends on ced retains its accent.

The negative particle na may be prefixed to ced either immediately or separated from it (e. g. na ced vaćaḥ karishyati or na karishyati ced vaćaḥ, if he should not make a speech); and frequently the negative no is used in connection with ced, the verb being understood (e. g. dūram apasara no ced dhantavyo 'si mayā, depart to a distance, if not, i. e. if thou departest not, thou art to be killed by me). Sometimes no ced = api na, would that not! (e. g. no ced evaṃ kuryāt, would that he did not so!). Rarely yadi and ced are joined together, when ced may be translated by 'that is,' 'that is to say,' 'namely' (e. g. yadi ced rājyam avāpsyati, if, that is, he shall obtain the kingdom). In the argumentative writings of native commentators ced preceded by iti and followed by na is often placed at the end of an objector's statement (e. g. 'Ṛig-vedam adhyemi' ityādi vākyaṃ pramāṇam iti cen na, if it be urged that the text 'I peruse the Ṛig-veda' is a proof, no, it is not so). Atha ced, but if; [cf. ned.]

तद् tad, sas, sā, tad or tat, (the actual base of this pronoun in all the cases except the nom. sing. m. and f. is ta, but the neut. tad represents the base in compounds and in the derivative tadīya. In the Veda the nom. and acc. du. m. may be tā as well as tau, the nom. plur. n. tā as well as tāni, and the inst. plur. m. or n. tebhis as well as taiś), he, she, it, that, this, (often occurring as a correlative of the relative pronoun ya, 'who, which,' the relative generally standing in the preceding clause, e. g. yasya buddhiḥ sa balavān, of whom there is intellect he is strong, see Gram. 799.)

Tad is sometimes used, for the sake of emphasis, in connection with the first and second personal pronouns, with other demonstratives and with relatives like the Lat. ille (e. g. so 'ham, I that very person, I myself; te vayam, we those very persons: tāv imau, those very two; tad etad, that very thing; yat tat kāraṇam, that very reason which; yā sā śrīḥ, that very fortune which).

Tad is repeated in the sense of 'this and that,' 'this or that,' 'various,' 'different' (e. g. taṃ taṃ deśaṃ jagāma, he went to this and that place; tāsu tāsu yonishu, in different or various birth-places).

Tad is used in connection with a relative pronoun in the sense of 'whosoever,' 'whichsoever,' 'every' (e. g. yasmins tasmin kule, in any family whatever). Sometimes both the demonstrative and the relative are repeated (e. g. yadyat karma para-vaśaṃ tat-tat varjayet, whatever action depends on another, that he should avoid).

Tad, n., may be used to signify 'this world' [cf. idam]; also to denote 'the supreme spirit or Brahma' (opposed to tvam).

Tad, ind. there, thither, in that place, to that spot (e. g. tamāṃsi yatra gaććhanti tat kravyādo ajñyamam, where dark shades prevail there I caused the flesh-eaters to go); then, at that time, in that case (e. g. yadi māṃ na vihātum iććhasi tat kim-artham panthāḥ samupa-diśyate, if thou dost not wish to leave me why is the road pointed out?); thus, in this manner, with regard to that, in connection with that (often so used in the Brāhmaṇas, e. g. tad etau ślokau bhavataḥ, with reference to that there are these two verses); on that account, for that reason, therefore, consequently (in this sense commonly used in classical Sanskṛit, e. g. yad—tad or yena—tad, because—therefore); now, so also, equally, in like manner (often connecting two sentences or clauses in the Brāhmaṇas). Tad api, and also, and equally; nevertheless, notwithstanding (yady api—tad api, even if—nevertheless); tad yathā, in such a manner as follows, as here follows, namely; taććāpi, and also, and likewise; [cf.
